STATEMENT OF QUESTIONS PRESENTED

This case presents the question of interpretation of a state statute so as to prevent a defendant from introducing evidence which is normally admissible. The facts concern the exclusion of character evidence during the sentencing portion of trial in violation of due process and fundamental notions of a fair trial.

Petition for Writ of Certiorari
To the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas

TO THE HONORABLE JUSTICES OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT:

COMES NOW the Petitioner, by and through his attorney, and petitions the Court to issue its Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Criminal Appeals of the State of Texas. As grounds therefor, Petitioner would respectfully show to the Court as follows:

CITATION TO OPINIONS BELOW

The plurality and dissenting opinions of the Court of Criminal Appeals are not officially reported, but are annexed as Appendix A, entered on June 21, 1989. A Motion for Rehearing was filed and was denied, without opinion, on September 13, 1989. The Court of Criminal Appeals granted a stay of the mandate in order to Petition the United States Supreme Court, said stay to expire on November 27, 1989 (Texas rules only allow one stay by the Court of Criminal Appeals). The opinion of the Court of Appeals is not published, but is annexed as Appendix B.

JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction is alleged under 28 U.S.C., Sec. 1257, in that the Texas statute on sentencing as interpreted by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals violates Petitioner's rights under the Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. In affirming Petitioner's judgment of conviction and sentence, the Court of Criminal Appeals held that proof of specific instances of good conduct were not admissible at the punishment hearing, although the Code of Criminal Procedure appeared to allow proof of character and the rules of evidence provided that proof of specific instances of conduct were admissible to prove character.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS INVOLVED

United States Constitution, Amendments V, VI, and XIV, are involved:

ARTICLE V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining Witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

ARTICLE XIV

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; no deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Texas Code of Criminal Procedure

Article 37.07, Section 3, Code of Criminal Procedure of the State of Texas (prior to amendment in 1985):

Sec. 3. Evidence of prior criminal record in all criminal cases after a finding of guilty

(a) Regardless of the plea and whether the punishment be assessed by the judge or the jury, evidence may be offered by the state and the defendant as to the prior criminal record of the defendant, his general reputation and his character. The term prior criminal record means a final conviction in a court of record, or a probated or suspended sentence that has occurred prior to trial, or any final conviction material to the offense charged.

Article 38.02, Code of Criminal Procedure of the State of Texas (repealed in 1986 when the Rules of Criminal Evidence were adopted):

The rules of evidence prescribed in the statute law of this State in civil suits shall, so far as applicable, govern also in criminal actions when not in conflict with the provisions of this Code or of the Penal Code.

Texas Rules of Civil Evidence

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character

(a) Reputation or opinion. In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. In cases in which character or a trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of that person's conduct.

Texas Rules of Criminal Evidence

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character

(a) Reputation or opinion. In all cases in which evidence of character or trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. Provided however that in order to be competent to testify concerning the character or trait of character of the accused, a witness must, prior to the date of the offense, have been substantially familiar with the reputation of the accused. In all cases where testimony is admitted under this rule, on cross-examination inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. In cases in which character or trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of his conduct.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Petitioner pleaded guilty to second degree felony theft, the offense occurring on January 15, 1980. Guilt was not in issue at trial, nor in this Petition. During the punishment stage of the trial, the State was allowed to present a great deal of evidence of specific acts of conduct of the Petitioner which were alleged to have occurred more than three years after the offense. Yet, the trial court refused to allow the Petitioner to present any opinion evidence of character and refused to allow any proof of specific acts of conduct by the Petitioner as evidence of character. Sua sponte, the trial court admonished all of Petitioner's character witnesses that they could only testify as to reputation, and further restricted the reputation questions to "peaceful and law abiding" and "truth and veracity".

Petitioner's counsel vigorously objected and, when the trial court refused to reconsider his ruling, asked to make a Bill of Exceptions as to the testimony of the witnesses. The trial court, contrary to Texas law, refused to allow such a bill to be made until after the case went to the jury. In order to preserve the point of error, short summaries of testimony of six of the fourteen witnesses were reduced to formal Bills of Exceptions and presented to the trial court as the case proceeded on appeal.

The Court of Appeals, Eighth Judicial District of Texas, held that the law as to character evidence was unclear, but opined that the testimony of reputation was not so different from the content of the short summaries as to constitute grounds for reversal. Until this opinion, the statutes, rules of evidence, and case law indicated that such testimony should have been admitted. Petitioner complained that such a construction of the law violated Petitioner's rights under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the court of last resort in Texas for criminal cases, granted discretionary review. On review, the Court of Criminal Appeals, relying upon a decision announced the same day, opined that proof of specific instances of conduct was not admissible as proof of character.

The Court of Criminal Appeals further held that the while the trial court's exclusion of the opinion testimony of character of the Petitioner was error, it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt.

THE QUESTION PRESENTED IS SUBSTANTIAL

This Petition presents the most fundamental right of an accused in a criminal case, the right to present evidence on his own behalf. In the punishment or sentencing phase of a criminal trial, often the only evidence that an accused will present is of his character; why his sentence should be less that the maximum authorized by law. The trial court in this case, refused to allow any proof of character, and limited the Petitioner to sterile proof of reputation. Under Texas law, both statutory and by rules of court, the restriction violated the clear requisites of the law and the judgment should have been reversed. The Court of Appeals and the Court of Criminal Appeals adopted an extremely restrictive reading of the statutes and rules and such a strict interpretation violates fundamental Constitutional rights to a fair trial and due process of law.

While this Court has yet to decide the issue here presented in a non-capital case, the Court in a number of cases involving the death penalty has repeatedly recognized the importance of the ability of the accused to present evidence on his own behalf. Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262, 96 S.Ct. 2950, 49 L.Ed.2d 929 (1976). Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95, 99 S.Ct. 2150, 60 L.Ed.2d 738 (1979). The Court has also recognized the importance of the accused's right to present evidence on his own behalf. Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 87 S.Ct. 1920, 18 L.Ed.2d 1019 (1967). Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95, 93 S.Ct. 351, 34 L.Ed.2d 330 (1972). Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 93 S.Ct. 1038, 35 L.Ed.2d 297 (1973).

PRESERVATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

Petitioner made a proper objection at trial to the exclusion of evidence. Petitioner, in his Motion for New Trial to the trial court, pointed out that he was denied due process and a fair trial:

> The Trial Court materially erred in restricting the testimony of the Defendant's witnesses in their testimony of the character of the Defendant. Character of the Defendant is specifically in issue in the punishment phase of a criminal trial in arriving at an appropriate punishment. The prosecution had introduced evidence of alleged specific acts of misconduct, opening the door to this type of evidence, even though the Defendant asserts it is admissible anyway. The attorney for the State conducted a wholesale attack upon the character of the Defendant, from which the Trial Court refused to permit the Defendant to adequately respond.

On appeal to the Court of Appeals, Petitioner raised the point that the statutes and rules were designed to promote a fair trial and allow a defendant to exercise his Constitutional right to present evidence on his own behalf. When the Court of Appeals rendered a restrictive interpretation of the rules and statutes, the first point in the Motion for Rehearing was the claim of Constitutional error.

The Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas, after denying relief on the basis of an opinion rendered the same day, Murphy v. State, 777 S.W.2d 44, (Tex.Cr.App. 1989), remarked on the significance of the questions presented by this case, while avoiding discussion of the issue:

> Appellant also urges a Due Process violation involving a restriction on his constitutional right to present evidence in mitigation of punishment under the restrictive Murphy reading of Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a). Although such an argument presents interesting and provocative issues, it was not argued at trial or on direct appeal but was only urged for the first time in his motion for rehearing. Thus, this question, not having been raised or addressed by the court below, is waived as untimely.
> Footnote 3, Opinion on Appellant's Petition for Discretionary Review, Appendix A-5.

In fact the issue had been raised on direct appeal, merely avoided by the Court of Appeals. Petitioner quoted Cass v. State, 676 S.W.2d 589, (Tex.Cr.App. 1984) finding that an exclusion of the testimony of five witnesses to violate fundamental fairness. Petitioner also cited Robinson v. State, 548 S.W.2d 63 (Tex.Cr.App. 1977) and quoted therefrom:

> "To allow only the State to present such evidence would deny a defendant his rights under Article 37.071, supra, and the Constitution of the United States as construed by the Supreme Court in the Jurek case."

548 S.W.2d 63, at 65-66

The Petitioner urged that the statutes and rules of evidence were designed to insure a fair trial and due process nf law. When the statutds and the rules of evidence are ignored by the trial court, a deprivation of fundamental rights has occurred, not just a deviation of procedural form. Only when the Court of Appeals interpreted the rules and statutes in a restrictive fashion did the Constitutional error become readily apparent. Only when the statute or rule is unduly restricted to the point that Constitutional rights are impaired does a Constitutional complaint arise. That restriction was firmly applied on the same day as the Opinion in this case, when the Court of Criminal Appeals handed down its decision in Murphy v. State, 777 S.W.2d 44, (Tex.Cr.App. 1989).

In Murphy, the Court of Criminal Appeals held that it was reversible error for the trial court to allow proof of acts of misconduct during sentencing, when the acts were not evidenced by final, criminal convictions. The State had argued that proof of specific instances of conduct were admissible as proof of character. The Court of Criminal Appeals held that proof of specific instances of conduct were not admissible at all as proof of character:

> [W]e hold that Article 37.07, Sec. 3(a), supra, precludes admission of specific conduct to show character or anything else under the rubric of circumstances of the offender at the punishment phase of trial, either in mitigation or aggravation of punishment."
> Murphy v. State, 777 S.W.2d 44 (Tex.Cr.App. 1989)

Only when the Court of Criminal Appeals made its restrictive interpretation of Article 37.07, Sec. 3(a), and ignored Rule 405(b) of the Rules of Evidence, did the statute violate Constitutional rights. Even the opinion in this case emphasized the impact of the Murphy decision:

> In Murphy v. State, ___ S.W.2d ___, No. 102-86 (Tex.Cr.App. ____ 1989)(Opinion on Rehearing), this Court overruled a substantial amount of case law to hold that specific instances of conduct, even when offered as relevant to a defendant's application for probation, are generally admissible.
> Opinion on Appellant's Petition for Discretionary Review, Appendix A-4

Under this Court's holding in Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95, 93 S.Ct. 351, 34 L.Ed.2d 330 (1972), Petitioner's Constitutional claim was properly preserved.

ARGUMENT FOR GRANTING PETITION

Petitioner's case has taken a strange and twisting path on its journey to this Court. First, the trial court admonished Petitioner's witnesses without any request from the State that their testimony be limited. The trial court, sua sponte, called the witnesses for the defense before the court and admonished them as to the scope of their testimony:

> Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Wales has informed me that you have been summoned here as character witnesses. Now, a character witness is a very restricted kind of a witness. You are not going to testify about the facts in the case. You are limited to testifying about whether you know the defendant, what [are] the circumstances under which you know him, and then the question do you know his reputation. That does not mean what is your personal opinion, but do you know his reputation for--if the question is asking for his reputation for truth and voracity [sic] in the community in which he lives, your answer to that has to be either yes or no. You can't elaborate.

> Then the question is that reputation good or bad, and your answer has to be good or bad, and you can't elaborate on your answer.
> Statement of facts, Vol. IV, pp. 389-390, quoted in the Opinion on Appellant's Petition for Discretionary Review, Appendix A-2-3

The Court of Criminal Appeals acknowledged that Petitioner properly objected to this restriction on the testimony of the witnesses. The Court of Criminal Appeals characterized the challenge:

> Appellant's present challenge to the trial court's limitation of defensive character testimony is basically two-fold: that the court erroneously precluded (1) testimony concerning specific instances of good conduct and (2) opinion testimony. We will uphold the trial court's ruling in the former but the ruling as to the latter is erroneous.
> Opinion on Appellant's Petition for Discretionary Review, Appendix A-4

A second strange twist is that the Court of Criminal Appeals ignored its own rules of evidence. The Court of Criminal Appeals has promulgated Rules of Criminal Evidence which clearly provide:

> Rule 405(b): Specific instances of conduct. In cases in which character or trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, > claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of his conduct.

Nowhere in the Opinion on Appellant's Petition for Discretionary Review is Rule 405(b) mentioned. Nowhere in the Murphy opinion, upon which the Court of Criminal Appeals relies, is Rule 405(b) mentioned. At the time of trial, the Rules of Civil Evidence were in effect and were applicable to criminal cases by virtue of Article 38.02, Texas Code of Criminal Procedure. Purtell v. State, 761 S.W.2d 360, 369 (Tex.Cr.App. 1988). The glaring inconsistency is never reconciled, or even recognized.

The third strange twist is that the Court of Criminal Appeals ignores part of its express holding in Murphy; admissibility in response to the State's evidence. In the instant case, the State had presented specific instances of conduct, occurring some three years after the date of the offense, as part of its case in chief. Petitioner's attempt to provide testimony of his own in response was squelched by the trial court. The Court of Criminal Appeals never mentioned this basis for admission for the testimony, although the Murphy decision specifically recognized such a ground for admission of the testimony:

> Likewise, an accused can prevent the State from proving in the first instance unadjudicated bad acts or the details of crime resulting in convictions as a basis for urging the jury to deny probation or punish harshly. At its option, however, the opponent of such evidence may forgo objection with a view to eliciting other evidence of specific conduct to rebut it. By tendering the evidence in the first instance the proponent has in effect consented to admission of specific acts of conduct to inform the jury's discretion in deciding both what punishment to assess, and whether to recommend probation. He will not be heard to complain of rebuttal evidence of like kind.

Thus, the very day it decided Petitioner's case, the Texas Court of last resort held that when one side opens the door by introducing evidence of specific conduct, like evidence from the other side is admissable.

The State was allowed to present much evidence of negative specific conduct which allegedly occurred three years prior to trial. In its Opinion, the Court of Criminal Appeals quotes portions of the State's evidence:

> After his return, appellant met with Hummel and proposed a plan for the repayment of the money. Following the meeting appellant appeared arrogant and bragged to another attorney, "they fell for it."
> Opinion on Appellant's Petition for Discretionary Review, Appendix A-26

Yet, nowhere does the Court of Criminal Appeals discuss its own, just announced, rule that what is fair for one side, is fair for both. Here, the Prosecution was given free rein to destroy Petitioner's character, yet he was limited to feeble questions of general reputation. The Court of Criminal Appeals has previously recognized the importance of due process in such circumstances:

> To allow only the State to present such evidence would deny a defendant his rights under Article 37.071, supra, and the Constitution of the United States as construed by the Supreme Court in the Jurek case.
> Robinson v. State, 548 S.W.2d 63, 65-66 (Tex.Cr.App. 1977)

When this case was decided below, such standards were abandoned and the Court of Criminal Appeals held that Petitioner could not present evidence of specific instances of conduct in mitigation of punishment, even though the State had presented specific instances in aggravation.

Actions such as taken by the trial court in this case have been struck down by this Court in several death-penalty cases. Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 87 S.Ct. 1920, 18 L.Ed.2d 1019 (1967); Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95, 93 S.Ct. 351, 34 L.Ed.2d 330 (1972); Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95, 99 S.Ct. 2150, 60 L.Ed.2d 738 (1979). The due process clause is applicable to all criminal prosecutions and sentencing, not just to capital cases.

The fourth strange twist to this case is its attachment to Murphy. The Court of Criminal Appeals had already rendered a decision reversing the conviction in Murphy when the State applied for rehearing. In its Motion for Rehearing, the State attached a copy of this Petitioner's Application for Discretionary Review to its Motion. The State professed that Petitioner's statement of the law was correct and formally adopted Petitioner's Application in its entirety. Petitioner's appeal became coupled with Murphy although the facts were substantially different. In Murphy, the State called no witnesses at the punishment phase of its case in chief. The defendant offered no character witnesses, simply answered three questions: (1) that he was the person the jury had just found guilty; (2) that he had never been convicted of a felony; and (3) that he had never been placed on felony probation. The State asked him no questions. At this point, in rebuttal, the State was allowed to present five witnesses to testify as to specific conduct in the form of unadjudicated offenses. These facts are remarkably different from those in Petitioner's case where the State had already presented specific instances of conduct and the trial court refused to allow Petitioner to present his own witnesses as to character.

Petitioner argued that the State had confessed error, however, the Court of Criminal Appeals ignored this argument as well. The summary of the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeals is that a justice, who dissented in the Murphy decision, issued a plurality opinion in which two other justices joined, holding: (1) that proof of specific instances of conduct is not admissible as character evidence under Murphy; but (2) ignored the specific language of Rule 405(b) of the Rules of Criminal Evidence and a similar provision in the Rules of Civil Evidence; (3) refused to rule on the Constitutional issue of due process and fair trial; (4) refused to consider the evidence as responsive to evidence of a similar form already presented by the State; and (5) ignored the State's confession of error in its Motion for Rehearing in Murphy. Three other justice concurred in the result without opinion. Two justices dissented, one of whom filed an opinion; and one justice abstained. The Court found the trial court had erred, and over dissent, declared such error harmless beyond a reasonable doubt.

REQUEST FOR RELIEF

WHEREFORE, Petitioner requests this Court to grant review and issue its Writ of Certiorari and, upon review, to reverse the sentence in this cause and remand this proceeding for a new trial.

OPINION ON APPELLANT'S PETITION FOR DISCRETIONARY REVIEW

WHITE, Judge.

Appeal is taken from a conviction for felony theft over $10,000. Appellant pled guilty and elected to have the jury assess punishment. Appellant filed an application for probation which the jury denied in assessing punishment at eight years imprisonment.

The Eighth Court of Appeals, in an unpublished panel opinion, unanimously affirmed the conviction. Hedicke v. State, No. 08-84-00219-CR (Tex.App.--El Paso, 1986). We granted appellant's petition for discretionary review to determine whether the Court of Appeals correctly upheld the trial court's action of excluding defensive character testimony at the punishment phase of trial. See, Tex.R.App.Proc., Rule 200(c)(4). Although we ultimately reach the same result as the court below, we do so for very different reasons.

At the punishment phase, and after the defensive testimony of the defendant and the director of the Adult Probation Department Restitution Center, the trial court, following a bench conference off the record, called the remaining defense witnesses into the courtroom and sua sponte admonished them as follows:

> Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Wales [defense counsel] has informed me that you have > been summoned here as character witnesses. Now, a character witness is a very restricted kind of a witness. You are not going to testify about the facts in the case. You are limited to testifying about whether you know the defendant, what [are] the circumstances under which you know him, and then the question do you know his reputation. That does not mean what is your personal opinion, but do you know his reputation for--if the question is asking for his reputation for truth and voracity [sic] in the community in which he lives, your answer to that has to be either yes or no. You can't elaborate. Then the question is is that reputation good or bad, and your answer has to be good or bad, and you can't elaborate on your answer.

> I'm sorry, I know everybody wants to come down here and wants to speak for a friend and wants to say more than that, but the law does not permit it. We'll just get into long--I've seen witnesses do it hundreds of times.

Appellant objected to the admonishment in that it denied him the opportunity to elicit testimony from these witnesses concerning specific instances of good conduct and positive personal opinions. His objection was overruled.

Appellant's present challenge to the trial court's limitation of defensive character testimony is basically two-fold: that the court erroneously precluded (1) testimony concerning specific instances of good conduct and (2) opinion testimony. We will uphold the trial court's ruling in the former but the ruling as to the latter is erroneous.

Concerning the court's exclusion of specific instances of conduct, Article 37.07, Sec. 3(a), V.A.C.C.P., states, in pertinent part,

> Regardless of the plea and whether the punishment be assessed by the judge or the jury, evidence may be offered by the state or the defendant as to the prior criminal record of the defendant, his general reputation and his character.[1]

[1]Although applicable at the time of the instant trial in this form, this statute has since been substantially altered. See, Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a), V.A.C.C.P. (Supp. 1988); Tex.R.Crim.Ev., Rules 404(c) and 405(a).

In Murphy v. State, --- S.W.2d ---, No. 102-86 (Tex.Cr.App. 1989) (Opinion on Rehearing), this Court overruled a substantial amount of caselaw to hold that specific instances of conduct, even when offered as relevant to a defendant's application for probation, are generally inadmissible.[2]

In the instant case, appellant wanted to introduce testimony concerning specific instances of good conduct. Based upon Murphy, supra, we conclude the trial court correctly precluded such testimony. Thus, appellant's first challenge to the court's limitation of character evidence at punishment is overruled.[3]

[2]This writer dissented to the majority opinion in Murphy, and although still standing by my original position, I recognize allegiance to stare decises and thus abide by the rule of law adopted by a majority of this Court.

[3]Appellant also urges a Due Process violation involving a restriction on his constitutional right to present evidence in mitigation of punishment under the restrictive

Appellant secondly urges error in the trial court's exclusion of opinion testimony. Article 37.07, Sec. 3(a), supra, explicitly authorizes the admissibility of the defendant's "prior criminal record ... his general reputation and his character."[4] Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a), supra. So the question becomes a determination of what is meant by the term "character" under 37.07, and whether opinion testimony is included within its meaning. This question brings directly to the forefront the pervasive and historical misunderstanding of what character evidence encompasses. As anomalous as it may seem,

Murphy reading of Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a). Although such an argument presents interesting and provocative issues, it was not argued at trial or on direct appeal but was only urged for the first time in his motion for rehearing. Thus, this question, not having been raised or addressed by the court below, is waived as untimely.

although Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a) has been in effect in almost the same form for over twenty years,[5] this appears to be a case of first impression as to the exact meaning of the term "character" in this context.[6] In dealing with this point, the Court of Appeals understandably did not even attempt to make sense of the caselaw. The court found that even if there was error in excluding all

[5]Although reading the same, sec. 3(a) was originally contained in sec. 2(b) of 37.07, but was subsequently renumbered. When this section was renumbered to 3(a), in 1967, the following sentence was added: "The term prior criminal record means a final conviction in a court of record, or a probated or suspended sentence that has occurred prior to trial, or any final conviction material to the offense charged." Acts 1967, 60th Leg., p. 1739, ch. 659, sec. 22.

[6]Although past opinions have recognized the linguistic problem concerning the meaning of character evidence under 37.07, they have skirted direct examination of the issue. See, e.g., Butler v. State, 640 S.W.2d 612, 614 (Tex.Cr.App.1982); Jones v. State, 479 S.W.2d 307, 311 (Tex.Cr.App. 1972) (Roberts, J., concurring); Logan v. State, 455 S.W.2d 267 (Tex.Cr.App. 1970).

opinion testimony, it was harmless, with the totality of their legal analysis being, "[c]ase law is somewhat less than clear as to what is and what is not error in the area of exclusion of character evidence under 37.07." Ironically, we finally specifically deal with this question only after it has been statutorily resolved. See, fns. 1 ante and 7 post. Nonetheless, we offer the instant opinion as belated clarification.

At the present time it should be crystal clear that character evidence is nothing more than a very generalized term which describes a broad category of evidence. Character comprises a melange of personality traits and consequently there are varying evidentiary ways to prove character. Butler v. State, supra at 614; Mason v. State, 604 S.W.2d 83, 86 (Tex.Cr.App. 1979) (Clinton, J., dissenting); Ward v. State, 591 S.W.2d 810, 819 (Tex.Cr.App. 1978) (on Motion for Rehearing, Douglas, J., dissenting); 2 McCormick and Ray, Texas Practice, Evidence sec. 1324. There are three basic methods of proving character: (1) reputation of the person in the community; (2) personal opinion testimony of witnesses who know the person; (3) specific instances of conduct of the person from which inferences may be drawn. See, McCormick and Ray, sec. 1324, supra; Ray, Texas Law of Evidence, 3d Ed., 2 Texas Practice, sec. 1491, p. 168. This represents the present and proper conception of character, which is now settled as it has recently been codified in Rules 404(c) and 405 of the Texas Rules of Criminal Evidence.[7]

[7]Rule 404(c) states:

> Character relevant to punishment. In the penalty phase, evidence may be offered by an accused or by the prosecution as to the prior criminal record of the accused. Other evidence of his character may be offered by an accused or by the prosecution.

Rule 405 states in pertinent part:

Historically, however, the meaning of character has been in a state of nebulous flux.

To aid our understanding and resolution of the question presented, a somewhat tedious exploration of the history of character evidence is necessitated. Character evidence has its roots in the earliest of common law and the evolution of differing methods of proving character has convoluted the meaning of the term itself. Originally in England, personal opinion testimony was an accepted and regularly used method of proving character. Wigmore, Secs. 1980-1982; 2 McCormick and Ray, Texas Practice, Evidence sec. 1432; 2 Weinstein's Evidence, p. 405-4 (1986).

> Methods of Proving Character
> (a) Reputation or Opinion. In all cases in which evidence of character ... is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion.

However, in 1865, in the case of Regina v. Rowton, 10 Cox Crim.Cas. 25 (Eng. 1865), proof of character became limited to only reputation testimony, to the exclusion of opinion testimony. The Texas origin of this common law view traces back to the 1882 case of Brownlee v. State, 13 Tex.App. 255, 257 (1882). Brownlee relied on Wharton's 1880 text on Criminal Evidence and upon the foundation civil case on the question--Boon v. Weathered, 23 Tex. 675, 684, 686 (1859). Thus, at common law and for years to follow, opinion testimony was held inadmissible to prove character, leaving reputation testimony as the only acceptable method of proof. See, Moncrief v. State, 707 S.W.2d 630, 631 and 634-635, fn. 1 (Teague, J., dissenting) (Tex.Cr.App. 1986); Brown v. State, 605 S.W.2d 572, 574 (Tex.Cr.App. 1980); Wrenn v. State, 597 S.W.2d 369, 372, fn. 1 (Tex.Cr.App. 1980); Ward v. State, 591 S.W.2d 810, 818

(Tex.Cr.App. 1980) (Opinion on State's Motion for Rehearing); Smith v. State, 414 S.W.2d 659, 661 (Tex.Cr.App. 1967); Watson v. State, 156 Tex.Crim. 585, 244 S.W.2d 515, 516 (1951); Rogers v. State, 126 Tex.Crim. 39, 70 S.W.2d 188, 188-189 (1934); Kirk v. State, 118 Tex.Crim. 462, 39 S.W.2d 61, 61-62 (1931); Trammell v. State, 10 Tex.App. 467, 468 (1881).

From the rule that reputation testimony was the only proper method of proving character evolved the misconception that character was the linguistic equivalent of reputation. The two terms began being incorrectly used interchangedly as synonymous. In Wharton's chapter on relevancy, it is stated,

> Character, in the sense in which the term is used in jurisprudence, means the estimate attached to the individual by the community, not the real qualities of the individual as conceived by the witness. In other words, it is not what the individual in question really is, but what he is held to be by the society in > which he moves. 'Character,' therefore, is to be regarded as convertible with 'reputation.' [footnote omitted]. A witness, therefore, who is called to speak to character,--unlike a master who is asked for the character of his servant,--cannot give the result of his own personal experience and observation, or express his own opinion, but in strict law he must confine himself to evidence of more general repute.

> Wharton's Criminal Evidence, ch. II, sec. 58 (1884).

Thus, character and reputation came to be viewed as one.

Legal scholars soon began to rebel against this view, acknowledging that character encompassed more than mere reputation. Thus, further evolution through time appears to have resulted in reputation evidence taking on a life of its own, separate and completely independent from character, leaving the term character to describe the other methods of proof, e.g., testimony concerning opinion and specific instances of conduct. At that point in time, opinion testimony apparently began to be seen as the most acceptable type of character evidence, since specific instances of conduct were uniformly viewed as inherently prejudicial and reputation had become something completely independent from character. Thus, the meaning of character became even further convoluted as it began to be used by some writers to refer only to opinion testimony. With the passage of time, these varying misperceptions of character evidence were adopted and continually adhered to by different legal writers.

Thus, it comes as no surprise that even today we have judicial craftsmen voicing varying anomalous views of character. Regardless of the historically ubiquitous mislabeling of character, reputation testimony was, for many years, unquestionably the only approved method of proving character. However, various evidence experts such as Ladd, Wigmore, McCormick and Carlson, constantly and fervently advocated the admissibility of opinion testimony as a much more reliable method of proving character than the inherently unreliable hearsay-based reputation method of proof. Ladd, Techniques and Theory of Character Testimony, 24 Iowa L.Rev. 498, 513 (1929); 7 Wigmore, Evidence, sec. 1986, p. 166 (1940). By the early 1960's, statutory modification prevailed and in the codification and amendments of the various evidentiary codes throughout the federal, state, criminal and civil levels the voices of these critics were being heard and adopted. See, Federal Rules of Evidence, R. 405; Model Code of Evidence, R. 305; Uniform Rule of Evidence, R. 48; Texas Rules of Evidence, R. 404-405; 20 Hous.L.Rev. 1, 187-203 (1983); Ladd, Some Observations on Credibility Impeachment of Witnesses, 52 Cornell Law Quarterly 242 (1967); Ladd, Witnesses, 10 Rutgers Law Rev. 523 (1956);

Ladd, Some Highlights of the New Federal Rules of Evidence, 1 Fla.Law Rev. 1, 27 (1973); 2 Weinstein's Evidence 405-1 (1986). It is within the early phases of this aura of evidentiary modernization that Texas drafted its new Code of Criminal Procedure.

The 1965 legislature, in drafting the new Code, created a bifurcated guilt-sentencing procedure which, at that time, was considered to be one of "the most controversial" changes in the law. Art. 37.07, supra; Special Commentary to Art. 37.07, V.A.C.C.P. 1966). In the same article in which this novel sentencing trial was created, our presently problematical section 3(a)[8] was also created to address the evidence admissible at this distinct punishment phase. Through their enactment of Sec. 3(a), the legislature made clear their contemplation of the fact that the invention of a bifurcated trial implicated new evidentiary questions specific to the punishment phase. Certain evidence that would normally be highly prejudicial and minimally probative at the guilt stage, could result in just the reverse prejudicial/probative analysis at the punishment phase, since guilt or innocence was no longer at issue.

Legislative history reveals that two proposed forms of section 3(a) were rejected prior to its adoption. The original Senate bill version stated, "[n]othing herein contained shall be construed to change or affect the existing law as to the admissibility of evidence pertaining to the character, reputation or previous conviction, if any." This version was rejected as well as the State Bar Committee's proposal which stated that, at punishment, evidence of the defendant's criminal record, reputation, character and "such other competent evidence as in the discretion of the trial judge may be considered helpful in assessing punishment." Instead, the legislature codified a rule intermediate to these two, allowing evidence of prior criminal record, "reputation and character." Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a), supra.

We review all of this common law and legislative history to enable us to resolve the question of whether, under 37.07, opinion testimony is admissible as a form of character evidence. We think that it is. Two issues are critical to our conclusion--the legislative creation of a separate punishment hearing and the wording of the statute itself.

Prior to the creation of the 1965 Code, it had unquestionably been the general rule that reputation testimony was the only permissible method of proving character. However, this rule was based upon an entire body of caselaw which was adopted from civil law and concerned relevancy determinations involving guilt-innocence. The 1965 enactment of a bifurcated trial procedure, where an entirely separate punishment hearing was created, rendered the historical exclusion of opinion testimony at guilt-innocence subject to new scrutiny. The legislature for the first time had occasion to determine the admissibility of evidence only as to punishment. Further, this determination was made during a time when evidentiary codes were being modernized and the advocates of opinion testimony were beginning to be heard. Opinion testimony, as proof of character, was being accepted and statutorily authorized as admissible even as relevant to some guilt-innocence issues. These factors surely had a bearing on the drafter's decisions.

As to the language of the statute itself, it reads: "evidence may be offered ... as to the [defendant's] prior criminal record ... general reputation and his character." Art. 37.07, Sec. 3(a), supra. At the outset, it appears that the drafters obviously fell prey to the linguistic problems discussed earlier. The imprecise and redundant use of the term reputation as a separate animal from character renders confusion. In truth, reputation is no more than a method of proving character--a type of character evidence.

Linguistic problems aside, the very language of the statute evidences the draftor's intent to make opinion testimony admissible. Where the statute reads, "and his character," use of the word and clearly denotes an intent to include some other method of proving character in addition to reputation.

Opinion testimony is clearly a method of proving character, and its admissibility is nowhere specifically precluded. Had the statute read to admit "character evidence only in the form of reputation testimony" or solely "reputation testimony" or even only "character evidence," then one could make a plausible argument that opinion testimony was intended to be excluded based on the common law rule or the historical misperceptions discussed earlier. However, from the face of the statute it is clear that the legislature intended to admit character evidence which was thought to be something in addition to reputation. We find that the legislature's use of the term character, in addition to the term reputation and joined by the conjunctive term "and", evidences their intent to abrogate the old rule that reputation was the only approved method of proving character and admit opinion testimony.

Our conclusion is bolstered by what evidently has been regular trial court practice under 37.07, 3(a), supra. Opinion testimony is obviously routinely admitted at punishment, ergo the creation of the embattled distinction between whether a witness is an opinion or a reputation witness. The importance of this distinction revolves around a determination of whether impeachment by "have you heard" questions is allowed. See, Rutledge v. State, 749 S.W.2d 50 (Tex.Cr.App. 1988) and cases cited therein. Reputation witnesses can be impeached with these questions whereas opinion witnesses cannot. Such a distinction simply could not have arisen if opinion testimony was always precluded from trial.

We now hold that under 37.07, 3(a), opinion testimony is admissible at the punishment phase. Thus, in the instant case, the trial court's blanket exclusion of opinion testimony was erroneous. However, a finding of error begins, not ends our inquiry. We now determine whether the error requires reversal.

Our current and relatively new standard to judge reversible error is embodied in Rule 81(b)(2) of the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure which states:

> If the appellate record in a criminal case reveals error in the proceedings below, the appellate court shall reverse the judgment under review, unless the appellate court determines beyond a reasonable doubt that the error made no contribution to the conviction or punishment.

Although this is an appropriately high requirement for a finding of harmless error, the facts of the instant case meet this standard.

The trial court attempted to exclude the opinion testimony of eleven witnesses. Appellant perfected a bill of exception properly preserving the excluded testimony of six of these witnesses. As to the remaining five witnesses, who were not included in the bill of exception, we do not know what their excluded testimony would have been or even if they were prevented from testifying to anything, and we will not speculate as to such. Baldwin v. State, 538 S.W.2d 109, 113 (Tex.Cr.App. 1976).

Of the six witnesses whose excluded testimony is preserved, only five of these were actually precluded from giving their opinion. One witness testified to his opinion in spite of the court's ruling and admonition. The five witnesses who did not testify to their opinion, did testify favorably concerning the defendant's reputation for truth and veracity and for being peaceable and law abiding, with the overall evidentiary effect of such testimony being virtually the same as opinion testimony.

Concerning the offense committed, appellant, an attorney, pled guilty to stealing over $10,000 from his client, Brenda Hummel. Appellant represented Hummel in a wrongful death suit against the U.S.

Government which culminated in appellant's negotiation of a settlement for $330,000. For his services appellant received a $66,000 fee. Upon appellant's advice Hummel decided to allow appellant to place $30,000 of the settlement in an educational trust fund for her children which was to mature when they reached 18 years of age.

Appellant took the $30,000 and, instead of investing it, he placed it in his own bank account. On the day of this deposit and approximately one week prior thereto, appellant had written two hot checks on this account in a sum totalling $10,000.

When Hummel's first child reached 18, she attempted to contact appellant. Initially, appellant avoided her and refused to return her calls. When he was finally forced to speak to her, appellant lied and stated that the money was in a C.D. drawing interest and would not mature until a later date. After Hummel's continued persistence, appellant admitted that he had not only failed to invest the money but that he had already spent it. Appellant then staged an elaborate scheme to feign a mysterious disappearance and fled town only to decide later to return.

After his return, appellant met with Hummel and proposed a plan for the repayment of the money. Following the meeting appellant appeared arrogant and bragged to another attorney, "they fell for it." The seriousness of appellant's criminal conduct was best summarized by his own attorney as a "flagrant violation" of "[o]ne of the most sacred trust[s] that exists at least in the commercial world between an attorney and his client."

The punishment range for this second degree felony was probation or 2 to 20 years. Thus, the eight year sentence, while not the minimal punishment possible, was not the maximum that could have been assessed. Based on all the testimony, we find beyond a reasonable doubt that the court's erroneous exclusion of the opinion testimony of five witnesses made no contribution to the punishment assessed. For an analogous harm analysis see, Rose v. State, 752 S.W.2d 529, 552-554 (Tex.Cr.App. 1987) (Opinion on Rehearing).

Although we disagree with the portion of the Court of Appeals' opinion addressing admissibility of evidence at punishment, the ultimate conclusion reached is correct. Consequently, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

CLINTON, Judge, concurring and dissenting.

I agree with the Judge White's plurality opinion inasmuch as it concludes that by "character" evidence, Article 37.07, s 3(a), V.A.C.C.P., the Legislature authorized use of opinion testimony as to character. I am frankly puzzled, however, that in holding evidence of specific conduct inadmissible, in accordance with the plurality opinion handed down this day in Murphy v. State, --- S.W.2d --- (Tex.Cr.App., No. 102-86, delivered June 21, 1989), he chooses to characterize that opinion as having "overruled a substantial amount of caselaw...." --- S.W.2d at ---. Though a handful of cases were "disapproved" in Murphy, by and large our opinion on rehearing was an attempt to harmonize prior caselaw insofar as possible.

Having concluded error was committed in this cause, the plurality opinion proceeds to find it harmless, relying primarily on the Court's opinion on rehearing in Rose v. State, 752 S.W.2d 529 (Tex.Cr.App. 1987). The Court would do better, in my opinion, to await disposition of certain petitions recently granted to review various courts of appeals' application of Tex.R.App.Pro., Rule 81(b)(2) analysis to Rose error, before undertaking to rely on Rose here.

At any rate, this Court should not endeavor to conduct a harm analysis in the first instance, but should remand to the court of appeals "for it to exercise the unique power and authority retained by that court under Article V, ss 5 and 6 and other provision cited" at Juarez v. State, 758

S.W.2d 772, at 783-85 (Tex.Cr.App. 1988) (Clinton, J., dissenting). See also Hammett v. State, 713 S.W.2d 102, at 107 (Tex.Cr.App. 1986).

Agreeing with the plurality in its resolution of the substantive question of law we granted this petition to decide, I nevertheless dissent to its conclusion the error was harmless in this cause.

COURT OF APPEALS
EIGHTH DISTRICT OF TEXAS
EL PASO, TEXAS

ROBERT E. HEDICKE, Appellant,	)	No. 08-84-00219-CR
v.	)	Appeal from 205th District Court of El Paso County, Texas (TC# 41203-205)
THE STATE OF TEXAS, Appellee.	)

O P I N I O N

This is an appeal from a guilty plea before a jury to a charge of second-degree felony theft. The jury assessed punishment at eight years imprisonment. We affirm.

Appellant was an attorney licensed to practice in Texas. He initially represented the complaining witness in the probate of her first husband's estate. This professional relationship led to his undertaking her representation in a wrongful death action against the United States government for negligence on the part of William Beaumont Army Medical Center personnel proximately causing the death of her first husband. On December 27, 1979, the government issued a settlement check for $330,000.00 payable to Appellant and the complainant. The amount covered the claims of the complainant and two minor children. On December 31, 1979, Appellant and the complainant went to the Franklin National Bank in El Paso to negotiate the check. Appellant received $66,000.00 as his fee for handling the case. The remainder of the money was placed in the trust account maintained by his law firm (Upcher and Hedicke). Subsequently, the bank obtained four $40,000.00 certificates of deposit for the complainant. An additional disbursement of $60,000.00 was made to her by Appellant's partner on January 9, 1980. Additional disbursements by Appellant left a residue of $30,000.00 in the trust account. On January 15, 1980, Appellant wrote a check for $30,000.00 drawn upon the trust account and deposited it in his personal business account at the State National Bank in El Paso. A notation on the check indicated that the source was the Potter funds (the complainant's married name at the time). Without these funds, Appellant's personal account would have been inadequate to cover two $5,000.00 checks drawn on that account on January 7 and 15, 1980. These checks were given to Appellant's sister-in-law to assist her in making a down payment on a house. By February or March, 1980, Appellant had converted the remaining $20,000.00 in Potter funds to his own use. The $30,000.00 had been earmarked for trust investment of the settlement sums allocated to the complainant's two minor children, until each reached eighteen years of age. During the next two years, Appellant took steps and made assertions to the complainant indicating that, in fact, certificates of deposit had been purchased with these funds for the benefit of the children. The older child reached eighteen in December, 1982. As the date approached, the complainant made several unsuccessful attempts to contact Appellant. At the end of December, he finally advised her that the older child's certificate of deposit would not mature until the end of January, 1983. Toward the end of January, Appellant "staged" his own disappearance from his El Paso apartment and fled to Phoenix, Arizona. He abandoned his car there and ultimately fled to San Diego, California. After an absence of several days, he returned to El Paso and advised his law partner (Havekost) and an associate (Tanzy) of his conversion of the Potter funds. On January 31, he met the complainant and her second husband, advised them of the conversion, signed an acknowledgement of indebtedness, and made some tentative offers of periodic repayment. No repayment was ever made. Appellant's license was suspended by the grievance committee for a period of five years and the present criminal proceedings were instituted.

As previously stated, Appellant entered a plea of guilty before a jury. He admitted the factual events recited above. Appellant testified that on January 15, 1980, he discovered that his partner had made the $60,000.00 disbursement to the complainant. There was no illegality or unethical aspect of the act, but it was contrary to their partnership policy in terms of who should be drawing against particular client funds held in their joint trust account. Accordingly, out of alleged concern to safeguard the remaining $30,000.00, Appellant tried to transfer the funds into his own trust account which he had set up while an assistant county attorney. The cashier at State National Bank told him that the trust account had been closed. He then deposited the $30,000.00 in a personal business account which was still active.

He apparently did not discuss the $60,000.00 disbursement with his partner. He did not return the $30,000.00 to the Upcher and Hedicke Trust Account. He did not try to open a new trust account. He simply deposited it in his own account and not so gradually expended it. Appellant testified that at the moment of transfer on January 15, he had no intention of converting the money to his own use. the act was solely triggered by his partner's January 9 disbursement. Of course, the uncontroverted evidence was that on January 7, even prior to the disbursement on January 9 or its discovery on January 15, Appellant issued the first of two $5,000.00 insufficient checks on his personal account as part of his generous commitment to help his sister-in-law buy a home. The second $5,000.00 check was coincidentally issued on the same day the Potter funds were transferred. Neither check would have cleared without the conversion of the complainant's funds. Appellant testified that at the moment of transferring the funds to his personal account he had no intent to convert them to his own use. He acknowledged that soon thereafter he began to use the money as his won and that the funds were exhausted by February or March.

In Ground of Error No. One, Appellant contends that the court should have withdrawn the guilty plea for two reasons. First, Appellant contends that the court should have sua sponte withdrawn the plea when Appellant testified in such a manner as to negate an element of the offense as indicated. Appellant testified that at the moment he deposited the trust funds in his personal account on January 15, 1980, he had no intent to convert the funds to the benefit of himself or his in-laws or to deprive the owner of the funds. He admitted that shortly thereafter his state of mind and his actions satisfied such proof requirement. The negating evidence must go further than tending to show a defensive issue. It must reasonably and fairly present a full defense to a finding of guile. Garza v. State, 687 S.W.2d 325 (Tex.Crim.App. 1985); Varela v. State, 553 S.W.2d 111 (Tex.Crim.App. 1977). Appellant asserts that the State's indictment necessitates a finding that his theft intent be in existence at the time of the initial transfer of funds on January 15. He relies upon Taylor v. State, 555 S.W.2d 483 (Tex. Crim.App. 1977), in which a guilty plea conviction was overturned because of defensive evidence that the defendant had no intent to harm or defraud at the time he passed the check. Maintenance of the present guilty plea is not inconsistent with Taylor because of the difference in pleading. While both indictments contain an "on or about" date allegation, the effect is different in each case. The Taylor pleading required the jury to find that the passing took place on or about the alleged date, allowing certain flexibility in proof and finding. The precise actus reus of the offense was nonetheless expressly pled, and whatever the date of its occurrence, had to be accompanied by the alleged criminal intent. In our case, the initial deposit in Appellant's personal account was not expressly pled as an actus reus element of the offense, despite the use of the January 15 commission date. All that was required for proof and finding was that on or about such date Appellant exercised further control over the funds, without effective consent and with intent to deprive. Appellant himself admitted that such mental and physical culpability occurred shortly after the deposit and that, in fact, all funds had been so converted by March. The testimony relied upon by Appellant may have served some mitigating function, but did not give rise to a defense requiring withdrawal of the guilty plea.

The second basis for asserting that the guilty plea should have been withdrawn is an alleged breach of a plea bargain. A sentence recommendation was made by the adult probation department of seven years probation under the deferred adjudication provisions of Tex. Code Crim.Pro.Ann. art. 42.12, sec. 3d, along with a fine of $1,000.00. Appellant's attempt to characterize this as a plea bargain is founded upon Tex.Code Crim.Pro.Ann. art. 26.13 and the trial court's own written admonition given at the time the pre-sentence report was requested. We shall address these bases separately. Article 26.13 states that rejection of a plea agreement by the court requires that the judge permit the defendant to withdraw his plea. Article 26.13 will not support Appellant's position for two reasons. First, the recommendation was not a plea agreement within the contemplation of the statute. Under Subsections (a)(2) and (a)(3) of the statute, a plea bargain agreement is one entered between the State's prosecutor and the defendant. This does not include an evaluation made by the adult probation department which functions as a arm of the court, not the prosecutor's office. See, Ex parte Shuflin, 528 S.W.2d 610 (Tex.Crim.App. 1975). We did not merely suggest that interpretation in Mendoza v. State, 649 S.W.2d 126 (Tex.App.--El Paso 1983, no pet.), we expressly held so in response to one ground of error. That position was reiterated in Harrelson v. State, 668 S.W.2d 455, 456 (Tex.App.--El Paso 1984), aff'd, 692 S.W.2d 659 (Tex.Crim.App. 1985). See also: Contreras v. State, 658 S.W.2d 334, 338 (Tex.App.--Austin 1983, no pet.). Ex parte Rogers, 629 S.W.2d 741 (Tex.Crim. App. 1982), in no way stands for the proposition that such a plea recommendation by the probation department equates to a plea bargain. In that case, the Court of Criminal Appeals did review a 1980 conviction out of this same trial court. The opinion states that the record in Rogers discloses a judicial acknowledgment of the existence of a plea bargain. Nowhere does the opinion indicate that the basis for the plea bargain was a probation department recommendation. The argument is clearly outside the record of this case and Rogers.

Secondly, even if this were a plea bargain, its rejection by the court would not necessitate a sua sponte withdrawal of the plea by the trial judge. Article 26.13 merely requires that the defendant bye afforded permission to withdraw the plea on his own motion. No such motion was made by this Appellant until the appellate brief was filed. Rejection of a plea bargain does not abstractly or practically mean that a contested jury trial is automatic. It simply means that the defendant must be allowed to reconsider his options and, should he so elect, move to withdraw his plea. Rejection of a bargain may still be followed by a guilty plea to judge or jury or a contested trial on the merits. The critical issue is whether the guilty plea was entered under a false impression as to the continuing acceptability of the bargain.

Appellant's brief and his motion for new trial present a somewhat jumbled explanation of the events leading the guilty plea. Nonetheless, an examination of the entire record enables us to reconstruct those events. Appellant requested a pre-sentence report which was prepared by the probation department, making the recommendation mentioned above (deferred adjudication probation). Appellant expressed to the court and the prosecutor a decision to waive the jury and accept such a resolution. The State advised the court that they would not agree to a waive of jury under Tex.Code Crim.Pro.Ann. art. 1.13. The State took the further position that the return of a verdict of guilt by the jury precluded the court from thereafter proceeding under the deferred adjudication provision of Article 42.12, sec. 3(d). The trial judge accepted this position. Whether this interpretation was correct or not is not before us as a ground of error. Fully cognizant that the probation department recommendation was no longer (if ever) within the contemplation range of the trial judge, Appellant elected to proceed with a plea of guilty to the jury. Thus, the second basis for construing the recommendation as a plea bargain (the trial court's pre-sentence report at admonition) is equally without merit. Appellant was properly admonished by the trial judge and advised that the probation decision of the jury would be accepted by the court. Appellant was under no delusions with regard to his prospects of pursuing the probation department recommendation. No protest or motion to withdraw the plea was ever lodged prior to the motion for new trial. Even after the jury returned its verdict, the Appellant did not seek either a probated sentence or a deferred adjudication probation on the combined basis of Sections 3c and 3d of Article 42.12, recognizing that receipt of a jury verdict is distinct from entering judgment thereon.

The precise ground of error complains of the court's failure to sua sponte withdraw the guilty plea. Appellant's original punishment expectations were not founded upon a plea bargain, were expressly dashed prior to his entering the guilty plea, would not in any event require withdrawal on the court's own motion, and were not pursued by any action on Appellant's part to withdraw his plea. Ground of Error No. One is overruled.

The rationale for rejecting the second aspect of Ground of Error No. One is equally applicable to Ground of Error No. Five, and it is overruled.

In Ground of Error No. Two, Appellant contends that he was prosecuted under the wrong statute, and that if any offense was committed it would have been misapplication of fiduciary property under Penal Code section 32.45, not theft under Penal Code section 31.03. A reviewing court must examine the evidence in the record in light of a comparison of the elements of the offenses established by the competing penal statutes. If they are pari materia, the special statute more precisely depicting the criminal conduct must take precedence. Sarrat v. State, 543 S.W.2d 391 (Tex.Crim. App. 1976); Ex parte Harrell, 542 S.W.2d 169 (Tex.Crim.App. 1976).

In Tawfik v. State, 643 S.W.2d 127 (Tex.Crim.App. 1982), the statute proscribing criminal simulation, Tex.Penal Code Ann. sec. 32.22(b)(Vernon 1974) was found to control over the general theft statute in a prosecution for selling fake Egyptian artifacts. the former statute was held to be a more precise description of the type of victim, type of offender and actus reus of the offense than the provisions of Section 31.03. The conviction was overturned.

In Williams v. State, 641 S.W.2d 236 (Tex.Crim.App. 1982), another general theft conviction was reversed upon a finding that the conduct proven was more precisely defined by Section 32.33, proscribing the hindering of a secured creditor. Greater statutory precision was noted with regard to the type of victim, type of property and means used to commit the offense.

Similarly, in Jones v. State, 552 S.W.2d 836 (Tex.Crim.App. 1977), the Court of Criminal Appeals held that fraudulently representing a condition of unemployment to obtain welfare benefits should have been prosecuted under the former Public Welfare Act rather than the theft statute. Again, the victim, type of property and means used were found to be more specific in the welfare statute. See also: Falcone v. State, 682 S.W.2d 418 (Tex.App.--Houston [1st Dist.] 1984, no pet.)(theft of trade secrets under Section 31.05 more precise than general theft provision).

The question not addressed in any of the foregoing cases is which statute controls when the special statute is generally more precise but the general statute contains one or more additional and more precise elements not constituting an element of the offense described in the special statute. Such is the case here. Admittedly, Appellant's conduct is precisely depicted by Section 32.45. But is he guilty of more, especially when the additional character of the offense is not required by Section 32.45, but is a element of Section 31.03? As the Practice Commentary to Section 32.45 points out, an intent to benefit the actor or some third party is not an element of misapplication, but is an element of theft. Both improper benefits were demonstrated by the evidence in this case. Furthermore, an intent to deprive the owner is not a requisite of misapplication as it is in the case of theft.

A similar distinction is noted by the Practice Commentary to Section 31.05, but was not critical to the decision in Falcone since that court found insufficient evidence of an intent to deprive the owner of the documents which were to be criminally reproduced.

In our case, an intent to deprive the owner was established. Appellant may protest that he intended to repay or replace the stolen funds with interest, with no ultimate loss to the complainant. This superficially appealing assertion will not withstand closer scrutiny. Ultimately, no repayment was ever made. More importantly, if one were to steal another's 1985 Ford Thunderbird automobile with intent to use or sell it, ultimate replacement with an identical but different vehicle would not negate theft. The offense has already been committed. By the same token, the fact that fungible currency was taken in this case would not cause its replacement to negate the offense of theft. Thus, the general theft statute describes a more precise criminal intent than the fiduciary misapplication statute, and the existence of the additional element was substantiated by the evidence in the record.

An additional reason for overruling this present complaint is found in the logic presented by the 14th Court of Appeals in Boyette v. State, 632 S.W.2d 915, 919-920 (Tex.App.--Houston [14th dist] 1982, PDRR). There, the court found that nay error in prosecuting under the theft statute, as opposed to Section 32.45, was harmless due to the fact that the value of the property involved would have resulted in the defendant's exposure to the same third-degree felony punishment range. The same is true here; the theft and misapplication provisions would have both produced a second-degree felony liability. Ground of Error No. Two is overruled.

In Ground of Error No. Three, Appellant contends that the court erroneously denied four challenges for course against prospective jurors (Miller, Walker, Trujillo and Scully). The first three challenges were based upon asserted inability to consider the full range of punishment, including probation. Excluding Appellant's improper efforts to disqualify these jurors by contracting as to the specific facts of this case, the jurors were adequately rehabilitated upon further inquiry by the prosecutor and the trial judge. Miller, Trujillo and Walker each finally asserted that they could keep an open mind on the full range of punishment and could conceive of theft situations where probation would be appropriate. They personally could reasonably consider probation in an appropriate case. The challenges for cause against these jurors were properly denied. Barefoot v. State, 596 S.W.2d 875, 886-997 (Tex.Crim.App. 1980).

Prospective juror Scully presents a different problem. Dr. Scully was the employer of the complainant's present husband.

He had known them for several years. He had become acquainted with the purported facts of the case through his social and professional association with the family. In addition, he had upon several occasions been an adverse witness in federal litigation held by the Appellant. At first, he expressed misgivings about the effect of these contacts on his possible service as a juror.

Q. Is it fair to say if you were sitting as a juror in this case, all of these other things you've heard would necessarily play a part in your rendering of a verdict? It would be very hard to put them aside?

A. I think it would be hard to put them aside.

THE COURT: The question is: Do you think you could follow the instructions and decide the case based solely on what you hear in the courtroom?

JUROR SCULLY: I think I could, based on what I hear in court.

Q. Given the fact that you know the Hummels, you were on the opposite side of litigation in federal court, would the combination of that make you lean more towards one side or the other?

A. I would try to be fair and listen to the evidence.

THE COURT: The only thing I can ask you is what's your best judgment? Do you think you could be?

JUROR SCULLY: I think I could.

THE COURT: Okay.

Under the circumstances, it would seem to have been more advisable to er on the side of caution and grant the challenge for cause. Nonetheless, we need not reach the merits of the challenge. There is no disagreement as to the procedural requirements for preserving error with regard to a denial of a challenge for cause. See: Barrow v. State, 688 S.W.2d 860, 863 (Tex. Crim.App. 1985). The challenge is made, with the basis expressly stated. It is denied. An additional peremptory challenge is requested and denied. The defendant exhausts his peremptory challenges and is then required to accept the seating of an unacceptable juror. Appellant asserts that this course of action was followed and identified four objectionable jurors. In the statement of facts, the trial judge expressly denied additional peremptory challenges. An examination of the juror strike lists discloses, however, that in fact, by inadvertence or otherwise, the defense was provided an additional peremptory challenge. The defense and State juror strike lists are labeled as such. The jurors excused by agreement or cause are clearly reflected on these sheets and the court's list. The peremptory challenges made by each side are also clearly identified. The State struck ten jurors. The defense struck eleven. Appellant exercised peremptory challenges against jurors 6, 7, 10, 21, 22, 24 (Scully), 25, 31, 36, 37 and 38. He numbered his peremptory challenges one through ten, with two number sixes, one on the first page and one on the second. The twelfth juror seated was panel member 39.

Thus, the eleven peremptory challenges had full force and effect in determining the twelve members of the jury. In effect, Appellant received an additional peremptory challenge. Even if the ruling on Juror Scully was error, it was rendered harmless by the replacement of the peremptory challenge used to exclude him from service. Ground of Error No. Three is overruled.

In Ground of Error No. Four, Appellant complains of the exclusion of character evidence offered on his behalf in support of his bid for probation. Six bills of exception contained in the supplemental record disclosed the intended content of the excluded testimony. The bills reflect that the six witnesses would have testified as to their personal opinion of Appellant's character, the specific origin of their acquaintance with him, the nature of legal matters which he handled on their behalf, the successful outcome of those legal proceedings, Appellant's active participation in his church, his volunteer work with the church's youth work, its Christmas drama group, its softball team, a Thanksgiving church dinner, and his waiver or reduction of attorney fees to help struggling clients.

Despite the exclusion ruling, the bill of exception witnesses all testified at trial, in addition to five other character witnesses. The jury was permitted to hear the employment and social position of these eleven witnesses and the basis for their social, religious and professional relationships with the Appellant. Client witnesses were permitted to explain the nature of the legal matters in which Appellant represented them. Despite the court's ruling, several testified as to the successful outcomes of the legal proceedings. The others were implicitly satisfied with Appellant's handling of their cases. One witness testified as to the proper handling of his personal injury recovery funds by Appellant. The jury was also fully exposed to Appellant's work with the church youth organization, the Christmas play, the church choir and the softball team. Despite the court's restriction to reputation testimony, several witnesses managed to insert expressions of personal opinion and trust. In summary, the only actual exclusion involved Appellant's contribution to the success of the softball team, the church's Thanksgiving dinner, the personal character opinions of all proffered witnesses and incidental incidents of specific social and professional conduct.

Case law is somewhat less than clear as to what is and what is not error in the area of exclusion of character evidence under Tex.Code Crim.Pro.Ann. art. 37.07. Similar types of evidence have been reviewed by the Court of Criminal Appeals in numerous cases.

Singletary v. State, 509 S.W.2d 572 (Tex.Crim.App. 1974); Cleveland v. State, 502 S.W.2d 24 (Tex.Crim.App. 1973); Logan v. State, 455 S.W.2d 267 (Tex.Crim.App. 1970); Miller v. State, 442 S.W.2d 340 (Tex.Crim.App. 1969); Coleman v. State, 442 S.W.2d 338 (Tex.Crim.App. 1969); Culvahouse v. State, 440 S.W.2d 637 (Tex. Crim.App. 1969); Allaben v. State, 418 S.W.2d 517 (Tex.Crim.App. 1967). None of the above cases sustained the ground of error challenging the evidentiary exclusion. Even where the court concluded that error had occurred, it was not found reversible, particularly where other comparable evidence was elicited before the juries. Coleman, supra; Miller, supra; Culvahouse, supra. That is the case here. Even if certain portions of the evidence should have been admitted, the difference between that content and the actual presentation to the jury was insufficient to justify a reversal.

Ground of Error No. Four is overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.
